The bad breakup has spawned its share of bad poetry and overwrought pop songs. But, it also has inspired some very good fine art as well.

In its next exhibition, "The Progress of Love," the Pulitzer Foundation for the Arts explores the end of love and its aftermath. The show is part of an ambitious collaboration among the Pulitzer, the Menil Collection in Houston and Centre for Contemporary Art in Lagos, Nigeria. The three institutions will host three concurrent but unique exhibitions that track the arc of love. The show runs Nov. 16 through April 20 and will feature a number of related programs including films, poetry readings, lectures, panel discussions and gallery talks with curators and artists.

The exhibit showcases work from both Western and African artists. Highlights include Sophie Calle's "Take Care of Yourself," a multimedia installation that presents 107 responses from various women to a break-up letter Calle received by e-mail and video installations by British-Nigerian filmmaker Zina Saro-Wiwa who documents the mourning rituals of different cultures.
